

the 1990s, the number of people with a mental health problem has increased in the UK (Mental Health Act 1983, 1990, 1994, 1997, 2003).

There is a growing awareness of the need to improve the lives of people with mental health problems (Mental Health Act 1983, 1990, 1994, 1997, 2003).

The aim of this study was to explore the experiences of people with mental health problems who have been involved in research.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

The study was conducted in a community mental health team in the north of England.

1990
1991

1992
1993

1994
1995

1996
1997

1998
1999

2000
2001

