

the 1990s, the number of people in the world who are under 15 years of age is expected to increase from 1.1 billion to 1.4 billion (United Nations 1994).

There are a number of reasons why the number of children in the world is expected to increase. One of the main reasons is the high birth rate in developing countries. In many of these countries, the birth rate is still high, and the death rate is falling, which is leading to a rapid increase in the population.

Another reason is the increasing life expectancy in many countries. As people live longer, the number of children in the world is expected to increase. This is because more people are surviving to have children, and the number of children surviving to adulthood is also increasing.

There are also a number of other factors that are contributing to the increase in the number of children in the world. These include the increasing number of women in the workforce, the increasing number of women who are delaying marriage, and the increasing number of women who are having children at a younger age.

The increase in the number of children in the world is a major challenge for the world's governments and societies. It is important to ensure that all children have access to education, healthcare, and other basic services. This will help to ensure that the world's population is growing in a sustainable and equitable way.

There are a number of ways in which the world's governments and societies can address the challenge of the increasing number of children in the world. These include investing in education, healthcare, and other basic services, and promoting family planning and reproductive health services.

It is also important to ensure that all children have access to a safe and healthy environment. This includes ensuring that children have access to clean water, sanitation, and other basic services. It also includes ensuring that children are protected from violence, exploitation, and other forms of abuse.

The world's governments and societies have a responsibility to ensure that all children have access to the basic services and opportunities that they need to thrive. This is a challenge, but it is one that we must meet if we want to create a better world for all.

The world's governments and societies have a responsibility to ensure that all children have access to the basic services and opportunities that they need to thrive. This is a challenge, but it is one that we must meet if we want to create a better world for all.

